I would recommend that the City provide a list of employees who can communicate via sign language. If there are none, the City should send a couple of employees to appropriate learning courses to obtain these skills.

Page 6, Item 1: "panning" should be "planning"

The questionnaire included a review of the following topics:

The recent self-evaluation of programs, services, activities focused on several areas:

Page 12, last row of table: While I might agree that the explicit act of developing a policy statement might not involve a lot of time or money, the fiscal impact of the existence of a web accessibility policy is not "none."

I agree with most of your recommendations, especially those that center around training. However, I do not think it's realistic to expect that every department will have someone who is knowledgeable enough about website design to be able to do a proper annual review. As GRU's website is structured differently than the City's in that we do not have individual department websites, I think it would be sufficient to have our communications department do the review for the entire utility. I haven't spoken with them about that, though, and they may think differently.

Comment: The document's content appears to be fairly comprehensive. Many of my answers were "I don't know," therefore, I found the DRAFT information regarding both ADA requirements and how the City plans on meeting those requirements in the future.
